Binding elements are cheap, very durable and can be reused. Many people use comb binding machines; from schools and churches, to government and print shops. Comb binding is used to create notebooks, journals, cookbooks, reports and more. Several popular manufacturers of comb binding machines are GBC, Tahsin, Renz, Akiles and Fellowes. There are low volume, medium volume and high volume binding machines. Low volume binding machines are typically used in the home or for occasional binding. Mid volume binding is used for binding a few books a day. High volume binding machines can be used to bind dozens to hundreds of books a day. Some machines can only punch a few sheets of paper at once, where others can punch dozens of sheets at a time. Many people, who are on a budget, choose to purchase a less expensive machine and simply punch fewer sheets of paper at a time when binding a thick book. If time is an issue, and several books need to be created in a day, it is recommended to go with a machine capable of punching several sheets of paper at once. Which format is better is really up to the person using the machine. Many people don't mind pulling a handle to punch paper, but others like to have both hands freed for binding and prefer to use an electric punch. Most high volume binding machines use a motor for punching paper. Comb binding a document is very easy and usually involves only a few simple steps. If equipped, adjust the margin depth, guides and punching dies as needed. This includes both the cover sheet and back cover. This is determined by the maximum amount of sheets your binding machine can punch at once. Please be aware that punching the maximum amount of documents rated for your machine wear out your machine faster than if you punch 80% of the maximum amount.

As each stack of paper is punched, set it to the side. Make sure that the punched documents are in proper order. Punching may be done by pulling a handle or pressing a button, depending on the comb binding machine being used. You can find our entire selection of book binding covers here Binding Report Covers.
